Dental Caries and Periodontal Disease--New Perspectives. Caries is a bacterial infectious disease and periodontal disease is a bacterial infectious disease as well. As occurs with AIDS and Cystic Fibrosis, the therapeutic approach of these two diseases is a combination of complementary treatment for both diseases, including drugs and laser therapy, with the purpose of a cure. The dentists are aware of the fact that periodontal and carious lesions can occur together in the same patient and this clinical condition might be the consequence of a single microbial action. By investigating the exact microbial etiology associated with each single disease, this concept is going to be further deepened in order to formulate new effective treatment strategies to cure both diseases at once. By using molecular biology techniques and more recently developed immunologic methods, new insight of the etiology of periodontal and carious disease can be obtained, and innovative approaches can be defined to the currently used treatment protocols. One of these innovative approaches is the use of bisphosphonates as a new therapeutic tool in periodontal disease. In vitro re-endothelialization of poly(tetrafluoroethylene) vascular prostheses. In order to improve endothelialization of vascular prostheses, the effect of in vitro endothelial cell seeding on the growth of human umbilical vein endothelial cells (HUVEC) seeded on poly(tetrafluoroethylene) (PTFE) grafts was investigated. Human umbilical vein endothelial cells were exposed to medium containing foetal calf serum (FCS) or buffer as the alternative. The cells were incubated with fibronectin (Fn) and glutaraldehyde for cell attachment to the polyester substrate. After 24 hr, the HUVEC were injected into PTFE grafts (0.5 x 6 cm) and incubated under standard conditions. The quantity of attached and spread HUVEC was studied after 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 days. The endothelialized surfaces were characterized by scanning electron microscopy (SEM). The endothelialized surface of PTFE grafts had a different morphology compared to unmodified PTFE grafts. SEM revealed that the inner part of the graft had a higher density of cell-cell connections than the outer part. The difference was larger in FCS medium than in the alternative medium. The increased spreading of the cells could not, however, be confirmed by SEM. The in vitro
